Lament for Patrick Og MacCrimmon (2)

There are settings of this tune in the following manuscript sources:
– Colin Mór Campbell's "Nether Lorn" canntaireachd, ii, 120-22 (with the title "Couloddins Lament");
– Robert Meldrum's MS, ff.142-145;

and in the following published sources:
– Donald MacDonald, Ancient Martial Music of Caledonia, pp.84-88;
– Angus MacKay, Ancient Piobaireachd, pp. 82-83;
– Donald MacPhee, Collection of Piobaireachd, pp.8-9;
– David Glen, Collection of Ancient Piobaireachd, pp. 28-30;
– C. S. Thomason, Ceol Mor, pp.37-8;
– William Stewart, et al., eds., The Piobaireachd Society Collection (first series) i, 8-9;

In the "Nether Lorne" Colin Campbell develops the tune in a similar manner to Angus MacKay, quoted below, with ground singling/doubling, siubhal singling, taorluath singling/doubling, crunluath singling/doubling. Like MacKay, Colin Campbell does not specify a crunluath a mach:
"Lost Pibroch"

© Dr. William Donaldson

Published by pipes|drums, 2009
Donald MacDonald's score has a number of interesting points including his usual emphasis on the initial note of his echo beats rather than the second one as in MacKay, and his memorable first variation. The tune is on a more extensive scale than we see in Colin Campbell. The ground is repeated at the end of the doubling of the first variation and again at the end of the taorluath and crunluath doublings; there is no a mach. MacDonald's title is "Cumh Pharic More Mhic Cruimmen Lament on the Death of Patrick More McCruimmen":

"Lost Pibroch"

© Dr. William Donaldson

Published by pipes|drums, 2009
"Lost Pibroch"

© Dr. William Donaldson
Published by pipes|drums, 2009
Angus MacKay does not have MacDonald's First Variation, and there are also a number of typographical errors in his published score (F appears instead of high G at a number of points in his first variation). This version is shorter than MacDonald's, therefore, although MacKay does indicate that the ground be restated at the end of the taorluath and crunluath doublings, MacKay does not specify a crunluath a mach either. In the Piobaireachd Society Collection (second series, vol.3, p.84), the Society's editor, Archibald Campbell, claimed that the score reproduced was that of Angus MacKay, with the typographical errors corrected by Sandy Cameron. But a lot more was changed than simply correcting the typos, including extensive silent replacement of MacKay's dotted-quaver/semi quaver pattern in the ground with strings of crotchets. MacKay sets the tune like this:
Donald MacPhee times his eallachs "down"; and does not direct the ground to be repeated within the tune or at the end of it; otherwise he follows MacKay and adds nothing significant to the stylistic possibilities of the tune. He, too, has no crunluath a mach. MacPhee's score is not reproduced here.
David Glen's setting gives a fine example of his characteristic use of the slur to indicate smooth transition between notes. He plays his eallach "down," and also gives Donald MacDonald's 'First Variation', although he cadences it slightly differently from MacDonald and reverses the pointing. Glen has no crunluath a mach either:
PATRICK ÒG MAC CRIMMON’S LAMENT.
GUMHA PHÁDRUIG ÒG MHIC CRUIMEIN.
Composed by John Dall MacIvy.

Úrlar.

Dòbhsachadh an Úrlair.

Var. 1st

Written. Played.

and so on.
C. S. Thomason gives Donald MacDonald, Angus MacKay, David Glen, Donald MacKay, and Keith Cameron as his sources, and indicates that this was one of the tunes which his main teacher, Donald MacKay, was taught by Donald Cameron. Interestingly, he gives MacDonald's First Variation after the MacKay style one, and this is perhaps how some of the Camerons did it. Thomason repeats the ground after the taorluath and crunluath doublings and he, too, has no a mach:

William Stewart's score follows that of Angus MacKay, merely correcting the typographical errors and omitting the repeats of the ground following the taorluath and crunluath doublings,
The fullest account of this famous piece is given in a column "Fionn" (Henry Whyte, 1852-1913) contributed to the Oban Times, to mark the initial volume of the Piobaireachd Society's first series (which contained this tune):

The Scottish Piobaireachd Society. Test Tunes. Lament for Patrick Og MacCrimmon. Cumha Padruig Oig Mhic Cruimein—Lament for Patrick Og MacCrimmon.

This popular lament was composed by John MacKay, better known as "Am Piobaire Dall," or the blind piper, who was also a Gaelic bard of some note. He was born at Gairloch, Ross-shire, in 1666, and lived for the long period of 98 years. He acquired the elements of music from his father, "Ruairidh Dall," or blind Rory, who was a native of the Reay country, and died in 1689. His son was sent to Borreraig, Skye, to be educated at the MacCrimmon College there. He was not long there when he easily outstripped all the other students attending the college. His superiority aroused a good deal of jealousy among his fellow-students, and it is related that on one occasion they sought to get rid of him by throwing him over a rock. Fortunately he alighted on his feet, and suffered no material injury. The place is still known as "Leum an doill"—the blind man's leap. Leaving the college at Borreraig he succeeded his father at Gairloch. During his stay with the laird of Gairloch he composed no fewer than twenty-four pibrochs, besides numerous strathspeys, reels, and jigs, the most celebrated of which are "Cailleach a’ Mhuilear," "Cailleach Liath Rarsaidh." He frequently paid a visit to the Reay country. On one of these visits he heard of the demise of his patron and clansman, and composed the beautiful lament, "Cumha Choire-an-easain," which he adopted to a salute composed by his father Roderick Dall. The words of "Coire-an-easain" will be found in MacKenzie's "Beauties of Gaelic Poetry," p.98. Having heard that his preceptor was dead, John Dall composed a lament for Patrick Og MacCrimmon […] Some time afterwards he discovered that the report was unfounded, and decided to visit Borreraig. Among the tunes he played during his stay at Borreraig was the recently-composed lament. MacCrimmon enquired where he had learned it, and after some hesitation John Dall admitted that he had composed it for Patrick Og. "Indeed," said MacCrimmon, "Cumha Phadruig Oig’s e fhéin beò fhathast" (a Lament for Patrick Og and he still alive), adding "I must learn to play my own lament." John Dall died in 1764 and was buried in the same grave with his father, "Ruairidh Dall," in the clachan of his native parish, Gairloch. He was succeeded by his son, Angus, who in time was succeeded by his son, John.

The four members of the family were pipers in succession to eight chiefs of Gairloch—the succession being in each case from father to son. John MacKay went to America in 1802, and died in Pictou in 1835, when over eighty years of age. It is interesting to know that a great-grandson of the "Piobaire Dall" was stipendiary magistrate in Nova Scotia, and died in 1884, in the 91st year of his age. He had a family of four sons and six daughters, several of whom survive. Murdoch Fraser, a nephew of the stipendiary magistrate, has the chanter which belonged to the pipes on which John Dall used to play.

John Dall was acknowledged to be equal to the best of the MacCrimmons, and his abilities gave rise to the proverb—"An gille toirt bàrr air MacCriumein" (the lad outstripping MacCrimmon) […]" (Oban Times, 08/04/1905, p.3)

John MacDonald of Inverness was regarded as the greatest exponent of this tune during the early 20th century. John McCallum of Taynult wrote recalling him playing it at Oban before the Great War: "I can well recollect how every one present who had some knowledge of the music was electrified before he had played many bars. The late Mr Fraser of Lochawe Hotel and Carraig Thura was beside me at the time, and was greatly uplifted..." (Oban Times, 28/07/1923, p.3)

And this, also, was the tune Bob Brown played leading the cortege away from 3 Perceval Road, Inverness, at John MacDonald's funeral on 8 June 1953.

* * *

Electronic text © Dr. William Donaldson, Aberdeen, Scotland, March 2009